After 1909, he never lived in Dublin, and after 1912 he never set foot in Ireland again, despite living until 1941. Like any emigrant, his reasons for leaving (which will be explored during a Joycean-themed tour of EPIC The Irish Emigration Museum in Dublin this Friday, see below for details) were both deeply personal and reflective of broader societal trends. Firstly, he needed to find work. Æ Eva returned to Dublin, but Eileen remained on the continent for the rest of her life, marrying a Czech bank cashier. Æ Some of Joyce’s most famous critiques of Irish society can be found in these works, where he decries Irish society’s conservatism, pietism and blinkered nationalism: "Do you know what Ireland is? asked Stephen with cold violence. Ireland is the old sow that eats her farrow."

Some lived in their car, others suffered family abuse, and almost all encountered rejection after rejection professionally and personally—before finally landing a foot in the door. Read on and get inspired! 1. J.K. Rowling. King was broke and struggling when he was first trying to write. He lived in a trailer with his wife—a writer—and they both worked multiple jobs to support their family while pursuing their craft. They were so poor they had to borrow clothes for their wedding and had gotten rid of the telephone because it was too expensive. King received so many rejection letters for his works that he developed a system for collecting them. In his book On Writing, he recalls:

"By the time I was 14...the nail in my wall would no longer support the weight of the rejection slips impaled upon it.
